

FIG. 129.—Human skin one week after exposure to strong concentration of mustard-gas vapor. Microscopically, the changes consist of increased cornification, pyknosis of the cells of the epidermis, and necrosis of the papillary layer of the corium. The only living cells in the upper portion of the corium are pigmented chromatophores