

FIG. 151.—Diagram showing the necessity of determining the intraneural location of a given branch. A motor branch may leave the sensory side of a nerve trunk, and intraneural dissection is required to establish its deep origin which represents the motor sector of the trunk; the superficial origin of nerve branches is often misleading and varies considerably